Medicaid and Medicare enrollment in the major federal health insurance programs have been steadily rising since the 1970s, and like Social Security, Medicare enrollment would be difficult to significantly reduce, a change unlikely to affect the programs' solvency. Despite these similarities, however, the Senate Finance Committee spent much of the June 30 markup on the sweeping health care plan produced by its Finance Committee hearings looking to address enrollment, including particularly the Medicaid program. On June 21, 2011, the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation released its first annual State Health Rankings® (SHR), showing the leading states and a number of other states with some of the healthiest citizens. These are the states that offer the best protection for their citizens when it comes to managing their health, and also the best chance for their citizens to live longer. The ranking system factors in eight measures to determine how healthy, or unhealthy, each state is, from access to dental care, to public health spending, to obesity and diabetes. And while income, health care spending, and overall health status play a role in determining a state's overall health ranking, the most influential ranking in this case is access to health care, which factors in a state's ability to provide basic and preventive care services. In order for a state to attain a perfect score of 100 percent, it must have universal access to preventative services, such as vaccines, dental care, and much more. The best states? Well, that's another discussion. What this report shows is that those states with the best health indicators tend to be high-income states, which are also generally the most conservative states. The Southern states, as you might expect, score the lowest on this scale, with Mississippi at the bottom. Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida are a group of states that are held to be among the lowest in the country in terms of their education levels, as well as their economic health. The nation's most populous state, California, has a perfect score. Several of these states have spent considerable money (in terms of revenue) battling an ongoing obesity epidemic, with mixed results. Not surprisingly, these states are also home to many of the nation's poor citizens, and to a large population of uninsured citizens. In the center of the country — in the heart of the Interstate Highway System — there is a group of states that seem to be in between. We are talking about the Midwest in general and, specifically
